Being able to relate to images around the school, seeing transgender or non-binary flags and colors, or hearing transgender experiences and voices in the classroom, helps students to feel seen and represented at school. It also encourages young people to be their authentic awesome selves at school, which helps them to thrive.

This is why a supportive school is so important. Here is an example of what this might look like:

Rhian is transgender and is really worried about telling her parents about her gender identity because she does not think that her parents will understand and might be angry. Mr. Jones has given Rhian some postcards with links to information for her parents about transgender terms and what they mean as well as the school policy and how the school is supporting students who are transgender, non-binary or gender exploring. Rhian takes these home and gives them to her parents.
